Special Issue on: Nursing and Health Care History

Health care has continually played an important role in society across time and civilisations. Nurses and other health professionals have evolved in its different contexts with changing responsibilities driven by many factors. The nature of clinical and professional practice has grown or diminished within a background of conditions such as the environment, medical knowledge and technological advances, particularly over recent decades. Understanding the evolution of the relationship of nurses and other professions to health is important to remembering the past and understanding the nature of health care today. With a view to facilitating such awareness, this special issue will provide a forum for showcasing research and dialogue around a range of aspects related to nursing and health care history.

Potential topics include:

- ▶ Nursing or midwifery history
- ▶ Catalysts in or impacts on health care, organisations, and systems change
- ▶ Nursing, midwifery or health professional education history
- ▶ Clinical or professional practice history
- ▶ Indigenous health care
- ▶ Health care heritage, archives and museums
- ▶ Biographical papers
- ▶ Historical methods in nursing history inquiry

Submissions of any of the above topics and related issues are welcome.

Please feel free to contact the Editor-in-Chief in advance for advice on potential suitability of any proposed manuscripts. For general guidelines on the appropriate preparation of manuscripts please visit the journal's website.

Please submit your paper to Collegian www.journals.elsevier.com/collegian via EVISE, indicating that it is intended for this special issue
